OEB should reject the increase as it is yet another household cost of living expense in which wages have not kept up (ex. higher than the currently legislative cap on public service workers wage increases), and is more debt to households who are already dealing with unbelievable increases. OEB should only consider permitting an increase of the rate if it subsequently decreases one year after to the original rate. The risk with rate increases and more users opting for smart thermostats means shrinkflation to our services (paying more or same for less) which is unacceptable for a public service.
